Abstract

A new institutional framework was designed under the Eastern Partnership and it has been progressively established over the past two years to frame the increasingly close relationship between the EU and its Eastern neighbours. This working paper provides an early assessment of the Eastern Partnership's institutional functioning. It focuses on the multilateral track (thematic platforms and panels, participatory initiatives, flagship initiatives) which for the first time gathers all six Eastern partners and the EU at various levels of representation and in different arenas. The EaP's multilateral track is thus an attempt to develop a multilayered and participative institutional framework based upon a logic of socialisation.

An examination of the 'governmental track' highlights however a discrepancy between levels of cooperation. While panels are assessed very positively and foster links both among Eastern partners and with the EU, other formats, including platform meetings, do not appear to favour joint ownership of the policy process. Another weakness is the current lack of synergies between various institutional formats under the multilateral track. Overall the paper identifies three potential sources of tensions in the EaP functioning:

- EU member states' uneven engagement in the policy process: while Western European member states' participation in the multilateral track is weak, their involvement is needed to turn the Eastern Partnership into a EU-wide foreign policy;
- Partner countries' different level of involvement in the multilateral track, which is perceived by some of them as a 'one-size-fits-all' exercise;
- The combination, in the multilateral track, of a logic based upon joint ownership, inclusiveness and socialisation with some elements reflecting a more hierarchical approach and limiting participation.

Introduction

Launched in 2009, the Eastern Partnership was designed to step up the European Union's relations with its Eastern neighbours 'without prejudice to [their] aspirations for their future relationship with the EU' (European Commission 2008a: 2). In other words, the Eastern Partnership is about 'accelerating political association and further economic integration' between the EU and its neighbours (Council of the European Union 2009: 6) while the issue of accession is left open.

The establishment of a new institutional set-up to manage the enhanced relationship between the EU and its Eastern neighbours has been a substantial task under the new initiative over the past two years. It is also a major turning point in the Union's policy vis-à-vis its Eastern neighbourhood. Indeed, the European Neighbourhood Policy (ENP) launched in 2004 to foster stability, security and prosperity at the enlarged EU's borders had not introduced any new institutional scheme to sustain these objectives. As a result, from 2004 until the creation of the Eastern Partnership, bilateral cooperation between the EU and its new Eastern neighbours, (considered as the ENP's cornerstone) exclusively developed under the existing contractual framework (i.e. Partnership and Cooperation Councils and Committees) and following the political guidance provided by the ENP Action Plans.

While an abundant literature has developed around the neighbourhood policy, its institutional functioning has received less attention from scholars, principally because the ENP was initially not associated with a new institutional design, but rather relied upon existing bilateral arrangements with partner countries. However, following its mixed assessment of ENP implementation in 2006, the European Commission suggested to introduce a multilateral dimension in the ENP with a view to tackling the weaknesses noted thus far in the policy (European Commission 2006). The belief that bilateral relations with partner countries need to be complemented by a regional or multilateral dimension is at the roots of several EU policy initiatives launched in the end of the 2000's, e.g. the Eastern Partnership and the Union for the Mediterranean but also, outside the ENP framework, the Partnership with Central Asia. While all these initiatives aim at fostering links between partner countries and with the EU, they are based upon different logics: whereas the Union for the Mediterranean (like the Black Sea Synergy) follows a project-based, neo-functional approach, the Eastern Partnership is focused on the EU acquis as the main referential for multilateral discussions. These initiatives introducing (in the case of the East) or reshaping (in the case of the South) a multilateral/regional dimension have attracted a new academic interest (see e.g. Bechev and Nicolaïdis 2008; Hillion and Mayhew 2009: 11-16; Weber 2010: 84-90) with a view to analyzing "horizontal governance structures" (Weber 2010) launched by the EU. However, owing to the fact that these initiatives are recent and, to some extent, still under construction, there has been no detailed assessment of their institutional functioning to date.

How has the multilateral dimension developed so far under the Eastern Partnership?

The Eastern Partnership provides for a dual policy framework which combines a bilateral and a multilateral track. So far, developments under the bilateral track have not significantly altered the institutional scheme of relations between the EU and its neighbours in that these relations are still contractually based on existing PCAs. This will change, however, once Association Agreements currently under negotiation are in force; these are indeed expected to significantly strengthen economic integration and political dialogue between the EU and partner countries, therefore calling for renewing the institutional framework in place between the EU and associated countries¹ While the institutional framework governing bilateral relations between the EU and its neighbours is currently unchanged, the bilateral track is the main instrument to frame the closer relationship between the EU and its Eastern neighbours. In other words, the EU's Eastern policy continues to be governed by the principle of differentiation. The bilateral track includes the most important objectives and incentives in EU-partner countries' enhanced cooperation, i.e.:

- the upgrading of contractual relations towards association agreements,
- the prospect of negotiations for deep and comprehensive free trade areas,
- capacity-building support to meet the requirements stemming from these agreements,

1 As indicated in: European External Action Service, 3rd Joint Progress Report, Negotiations on the EU-Ukraine Association Agreement, 26 November 2009, http://www.eeas.europa.eu/ukraine/docs/assoc_agreement_3rd_joint_progress_report.pdf

- progressive visa liberalisation in a secure environment,
- deeper co operation to enhance energy security,
- support for economic and social policies designed to reduce disparities.

Whereas it is envisioned as ‘an additional instrument’ and as a framework ‘supporting progress in partners’ bilateral relations with the EU’ (European Commission 2008a: 8), the multilateral track represents a real innovation in the institutional format of cooperation. For the first time, it gathers all six Eastern partners and the EU at various levels of representation and in different arenas. This stands in sharp contrast to the EU’s previous policies in the region which, taking into account the disintegration dynamics prevailing in the post-Soviet space, were predominantly (if not exclusively) based upon bilateral ties (Delcour 2011). The objectives pursued by the EaP’s multilateral track are as follows (European Commission 2008a):

- provide a forum to share information and experience on partners’ steps towards transition, reform and modernisation,
- facilitate the development of common positions and joint activities,
- foster links among the partners themselves,
- through the presentation and explanation of relevant EU legislation, contribute to initiating a structured approximation process.

To what extent and how has this unprecedented multilateral track contributed to fulfilling the EaP’s objectives towards a deeper relationship so far?

The present paper will provide a tentative assessment of the Eastern Partnership’s institutional functioning focusing on its innovative component, i.e. the multilateral track. Such assessment is subject to two major limitations. First, it is necessarily provisional, taking into account the fact that some parts of the EaP’s institutional framework are still under construction. Second, given the scattered and sometimes outdated information available, it does not pretend to be a fully-fledged evaluation. This paper is based upon an analysis of various EaP sources and the nascent academic literature on the EaP, as well as upon a series of interviews conducted in Brussels with EaP stakeholders in July 2011 (see list in annex) . Drawing upon these sources, it intends to shed light on the EaP’s current functioning and on perspectives for its development.

A multilayered institutional set-up still in the making

The EaP’s multilateral track is an attempt to develop a multilayered and, to some extent, a pluricentric and participative institutional framework. As shown in the graph next page, it is a complex setting involving different levels of representation. The institutional framework is organised around several formats which all act as forums of discussion and contribute towards fulfilling the EaP’s objectives.

The EaP multilateral track thus relies upon a networked form of interaction between the EU and its partners, reflecting ‘horizontal, participatory, flexible, and inclusive structure of governance often referred to as ‘network governance’ (Lavenex and Schimmelfennig 2009: 796). In other words, it draws upon a logic privileging socialisation and joint ownership whereas the bilateral track implies, in principle, a more hierarchical policy transfer through conditionality.

An insight into the operational structure and participatory initiatives highlights different levels of development among policy formats and across policy sectors resulting in uneven inputs into the policy process. To analyse the current state of play in the various EaP formats, specific attention will be paid to the following cross-cutting issues which are critical to ensure an effective functioning of network governance:

- inclusiveness, i.e. representation and participation of all relevant stakeholders in the policy process,
- interactions and synergies between various formats,
- joint ownership of the policy process by the EU and partner countries.

Political level

Technical level

EaP operational structure (the ‘governmental track’)

According to the European Commission (2008), the EaP’s operational structure consists of four levels:

- At the highest political level, EaP Heads of State and Government meet every two years. The Prague Summit in May 2009 officially launched the Eastern Partnership and the second summit was scheduled in September 2011 in Warsaw.
- Between these summits, policy guidance and monitoring are ensured through annual meetings of the ministries of Foreign Affairs. Both Head of State and MFA meetings are thus expected to ‘move and shape the Eastern Partnership further’ (Council of the European Union 2009: 8). The EU and its partners can also meet in various ministerial formats.²
- At the technical level, four thematic platforms (coordinated by the European External Action Service and the European Commission) serve as multilateral forums for discussion and exchange of experience. These platforms, the topics of which correspond to the main areas of EU-Eastern neighbours cooperation, are presented by the European External Action Service as the backbone of EaP multilateral track.³ In each thematic area, they meet at least twice a year at the level of senior officials and report to the EaP Foreign Ministers.
- The fourth institutional level is formed by thematic panels which can be established under each platform to support their work. These panels gather officials engaged in specific policy areas and meeting on an ad-hoc basis.

Thematic platforms

Table 1 below provides an overview of the four thematic platforms and of existing panels. It highlights a differential dynamism across thematic platforms. All four platforms initially met in 2009 and since then have held biannual meetings. However, so far panels have been created only under the first and second platforms. This reflects the core importance of these platforms’ topics in connection to the EaP’s bilateral track. Democracy, good governance and stability, as well as economic integration and convergence with EU policies are indeed cornerstones in EU-Eastern neighbours cooperation, especially so at a time when partner countries are negotiating association agreements and preparing or conducting talks for deep and comprehensive free trade areas.

The major issue identified in the functioning of the EaP’s operational structure, however, is not so much a gap between thematic platforms’ levels of development, but rather a discrepancy between levels of cooperation. The way in which the structure was designed reflects mainly a top-down approach with political guidance and follow-up being provided at high-level meetings, on the basis of information reported by thematic platforms coordinators. Interviews held in Brussels suggest that the three highest levels of cooperation (i.e. political meetings but also platforms meetings) either display shortcomings linked to the setting up of new institutions or reproduce long-standing flaws identified in EU-Eastern neighbours relations. More specifically, this assessment applies to the thematic platforms which are presented as the main policy tool of the multilateral track:

- Platform meetings are in principle relatively inclusive and open to a wide range of EaP stakeholders. However, even though they are permanent members⁴ in their own right, representatives from the European Parliament and the Committee of Regions have not actively participated in discussions so far; they have attended platform meetings but have not taken the floor yet. Moreover, access is de facto restricted for other stakeholders, principally civil society. As an ad hoc participant, the Civil Society Forum is only eligible to participate on a case-by-case basis; for instance, CSF representatives presented their recommendations during the 2010 platform meetings (spring round). However, even though the Commission and EEAS favour its involvement, some Eastern partners delegations (e.g. Azerbaijan and Belarus) have objected to CSF’s attending platform meetings or taking the floor during meetings. This has been the case especially in those thematic platforms covering issues which

4 Full members in all platforms include EU member states, partner countries and the European Commission. Permanent participants include the General Secretariat of the EU Council and the European Parliament as well as the EESC (platforms 1, 2 and 4), the CoR (platforms 3 and 4), the EIB and the EBRD (platforms 2 and 3 for both).

Table 1. Overview of thematic platforms and current panels are considered sensitive by partner countries (e.g. platform 1). To take one example, CSF representatives were invited as EEAS guest in a meeting under platform 1 in May 2011 where they could take the floor to present their activities and reports, but then could not attend all sessions. Under platform 4 (people-to-people contacts), CSF representatives were able to attend all sessions during the 2011 meeting but could not take the floor. In other words, CSF's inclusion depends on the good will of platforms' permanent members, and therefore considerably varies.

- Given the limited participation of their representatives in the platform meetings, synergies with EaP participatory initiatives are insufficient. While they crucially hinge on stakeholders' effective engagement, interactions and synergies also depend upon the circulation of information. In this respect, EEAS' difficult birth, and more specifically the workload of EaP units⁵ as a consequence of staff redeployment/recruiting processes, have negatively impacted on the Eastern Partnership's institutional functioning. The EaP's multilateral track was previously handled by the Eastern Partnership Task Force set up under DG Relex of the European Commission. Following the creation of EEAS, this Task Force was dissolved. EEAS unit dealing with the multilateral track is currently staffed with 3 people, while the corresponding assistance projects and financial instruments (e.g. the flagship initiatives, the pilot regional programmes) are managed by DG DEVCO. EEAS' units being currently understaffed hampers the functioning of the multilateral track when it comes, for instance, to the dissemination of information.⁶ Joint ownership of the policy process is critical for the EaP's multilateral track, which is underpinned by a logic of socialisation. However, the extent to which this track is jointly owned is questionable as the whole process appears to be framed principally by the EU. As a general rule, platforms are chaired by the Commission and the EEAS, which places the EU at the centre of what currently resembles a hub-and-spoke rather than a cobweb model of relations (to paraphrase Emerson 2004). The EU side is responsible for convening meetings, setting a provisional agenda, presiding meetings, managing information flows including meeting reports⁷ and it also plays a predominant role when it comes to setting objectives and reviewing progress. Such role can first be explained by organisational factors. As put by an interviewee, 'someone has to take the lead and chair meetings'; and many EU member states have so far been reluctant to invest time and resources in the multilateral track. Moreover, in light of tensions or even antagonism between some partner countries the EU appears as a potential honest broker. An additional argument is that the EU's being at the core of the process enhances policy effectiveness and impact on partner countries. Platform meetings were indeed conceived as 'dedicated sessions devoted to the presentation and explanation by the European Union of EU legislation and standards, as well as its comparison with national policy and legislation' (Council of the European Union 2009). Following this approach, the EU, then, seems better placed to structure the socialisation process and to 'name and shame' 'bad pupils' in each issue area. However, those partner countries lagging behind in the convergence process with the EU may find little added value to a multilateral track reproducing the asymmetry they denounce in the bilateral track; several interviewees indeed strongly criticised the 'teacher-to-pupil tone'⁸ employed by the EU during platform meetings. Even though the multilateral track formally engages five partner countries, the central role played by the EU in platform meetings thus raises major questions as to their actual capacity to stimulate 'reluctant neighbours'.

Panels

Panels, on the contrary, are assessed very positively by all stakeholders.

- Because they are less politicised, panels are de facto more inclusive. There is less reluctance to involve CSF representatives. For instance, CSF attended panels on anti-corruption in Warsaw in 2010 and in Tbilisi in 2011. In addition, other EU stakeholders are keen to be involved in panels discussing their areas of interest, as it is the case for instance the Committee of Regions with local democracy issues under the panel on administrative reform. As a consequence, panels may foster synergies and interactions between various EaP stakeholders.

6 This point was raised by several interviewees.

- Furthermore, according to interviewees panels allow for open discussions and effective exchange of experience between all participants on an equal footing, thereby contributing to fostering joint ownership of the policy process and links among EaP partners. This is also linked to the fact that panels' organisation is much more flexible than platforms' meetings and the role of the EU is less important in their functioning. Overall, partner countries are actively involved in panel meetings, including with a view to presenting their own experience of reform to their counterparts (as did Georgia under the anti-corruption panel). This format seems also more suited to Eastern partners' expectations in that it is tailor-made to their needs and situation. In other words, panels' added value stems primarily from their being circumscribed to a specific issue and therefore more concrete. Interviewees also pointed out their role as confidence-building tools among Eastern partners: unlike political formats, panel meetings do not seem affected by existing disputes or tensions between post-Soviet countries.

Even though some of them are still in the making, panels, therefore, appear as the most promising tool to reach the multilateral track's objectives. Two issues seem critical for their further development. First, panels should become more visible in order to foster a bottom-up policy process. In other words, outputs and information on progress achieved should be more broadly disseminated to other EaP stakeholders. Second, panels should seek to ensure the representation of a larger number of EU member states. Currently, interviews held in Brussels suggest that most of them are composed of (and supported by) Central Eastern European representatives. This composition is highly relevant in light of both these countries' reform experience and foreign policy priorities and it also secures a high level of commitment on the EU side. At the same time, panels could take advantage from their relative flexibility as compared to other policy formats to involve Western European member states' participants, be they officials or civil society representatives. Such participation would not only broaden the scope of experiences discussed with EaP partner countries. It could also contribute to a better understanding and to a gradual ownership of the EaP by Western European member states by initiating a bottom-up process. Nevertheless, given that most of these states (with the exception of Sweden and Germany) have been passive so far, strengthening their participation would also entail lobbying them.

Flagship initiatives

Flagship initiatives have a specific position under the EaP's multilateral track. Like other formats, they engage all Eastern partners with a view to providing visibility and focus to multilateral cooperation (European Commission 2008: 13). Unlike other tools, they are, however, managed solely by the European Commission (DG DEVCO) and mobilise multi-donor support. The implementation of the five initiatives highlights uneven progress so far.

Some improvement has been achieved in the Integrated Border Management initiative which was launched in October 2009 during the first meeting of the Integrated Border Management panel, and which started effectively in 2010, inter alia through the signature of a contract with the International Centre for Migration Policy Development for training activities. The Environmental Governance Initiative started in March 2010 with the collection of environmental data; the priorities and specific contributions of partners are currently being defined. Two other initiatives (Small and Medium Enterprises, which mobilises the EBRD and the EIB; and Prevention, Preparedness and Response to man-made and natural Disasters) are well on track. Under the SME Flagship Initiative, a programme supporting business associations, the East-Invest Programme, was launched in November 2010 with a budget of €8.75 million.

However, the Diversification of Energy Supplies (Southern Corridor) initiative is stagnating as a result of the competition between Russian and EU energy corridors projects. Overall, regional tensions and more specifically the role played by Russia in the Eastern neighbourhood may undermine flagship initiatives' implementation, especially in those issue areas which are highly politicised like energy.

Participatory initiatives

Civil Society Forum

The Civil Society Forum's organisation is complex. It partially copies the EaP operational structures in that it is organised in four working groups corresponding to the four thematic platforms. Each group is coordinated jointly by an EU and a EAP representative and includes a number of EU and EaP CSOs. The largest working group, Democracy, Good Governance, Human Rights and Stability, includes over 100 CSOs and is divided in 6 sub-groups, each of them dealing with specific topics such as public administration, judiciary, independent media and visa liberalisation.⁹ In addition to these working groups, the CSF includes national platforms headed by country facilitators; these coordinate activities related to a specific partner country and cooperate between themselves. On top of these structures, the CSF Steering Committee is composed of the 8 working group coordinators, the 6 country facilitators and 3 EU coordinators. Members are appointed for one year out of the CSOs participating in the forum ; the mandate is renewable once. Likewise, the Forum's participants are selected through a system of rotation, which ensures openness to new organisations but also eliminates the most active members (Kaca et alii 2011: 4).

The Civil Society Forum has been extremely active since the Eastern Partnership was launched with a view to developing links between EU and partner countries civil societies, promoting participation of partner countries' CSOs in their countries' public life and strengthening the role of CSOs in the framework of the EaP. This is reflected in the number of projects currently being developed by the Forum:

Number of current and planned projects by thematic area ¹⁰

Platform 1 Democracy, good governance and stability	35
Platform 2 Economic integration and Convergence with EU Policies	20
Platform 3 Energy, climate change, environment	15
Platform 4 Contacts between people	26

As also indicated by Lada et alii (2011), its impact can be assessed as positive as far as networking is concerned, yet limited when it comes to influencing the policy process. Undoubtedly, the Forum has acted as a catalysor in the dialogue between EU and partner countries CSOs, by fostering dialogue, exchange of information and work towards common positions. Besides providing a platform facilitating CSO cooperation, it also contributes to EaP implementation by drafting reports and opinions, such as those issued on human rights or corruption. CSF's contribution is constrained, to some extent, by its own structure (e.g. disproportion of working groups, uneven engagement of participants, frequent change in participants, see Lada et alii 2011: 26). In addition, the delivery of projects or policy papers impinges on the lack of financial resources. CSF got funding for specific projects from national governments and development agencies, yet as a forum it does not benefit from a sustainable financial mechanism for the time being.

The biggest obstacle to CSF's influence, however, is its limited access to the policy process, for the reasons explained above. Only on a few occasions has the Forum been able to present its outputs and recommendations before governmental structures. In the future, the CSF may be able to increase its role in the policy process by searching additional support from the EU side (from bodies which will become increasingly involved in the EaP, e.g. the EP, EESC, CoR), especially with a view to gaining a permanent participant status in thematic platforms,¹¹ and by securing funding with a view to becoming a sustainable mechanism and to developing advocacy projects. This is also critical in view of the persisting gap between EU CSOs and their counterparts in the Eastern neighbourhood which are confronted to a lack of capacities and a lack of experience in the policy dialogue. In spite of the Forum's positive record when it comes to networking, the Eastern Partnership has so far not significantly contributed to narrowing down this gap; building a partnership with societies is nonetheless one of the major objectives for the EU in its neighbourhood, as indicated in the EEAS/Commission 2011 Communication.

Euronest Parliamentary Assembly

While the European Parliament is also involved in the EaP through its committees and through bilateral delegations, Euronest is an unprecedented attempt to develop parliamentary cooperation with Eastern partners at a multilateral level. The idea of setting up an assembly gathering EU and Eastern partner countries was initially discussed as early as 2007 and thus preceded the creation of the Eastern Partnership. It originates in the EP's experience and practice of such assemblies with other regions, e.g. EUROMED, EUROLAT and EU-ACP assemblies. The enlargement process prompted the replication of this mechanism for the Eastern neighbourhood¹². The formal decision of creating an assembly with Eastern partners was however taken later, in June 2009, and from its beginning the initiative was thus embedded in the EaP framework. The effective setting-up of Euronest, nevertheless, was further blocked by the issue of Belarus' representation, with several options (including inviting representatives of the opposition) being discussed in 2009-2010. The massive repression which followed the presidential election of December 2010 prompted MEPs not to invite any Belarus delegation to the inaugural session which took place in May 2011. Euronest's first ordinary session was then organised in Strasbourg mid-September 2011; the assembly prepared recommendations for the 2011 Eastern Partnership summit in Poland which reflected the European Parliament's policy priorities and ambitious stance on the ENP, yet these were finally not adopted owing to divergences between South Caucasus partners¹³. The next Euronest session is planned in May 2012 in Baku.

11 The CSF has lobbied for such permanent seat enabling participation in all meetings and access to information ever since it was created. Interview with a CSF representative, July 2011.

12 Interview with a European Parliament official, Brussels, July 2011.

13 These divergences pertained to the principles to be included in the final text in connection to the unresolved conflicts, with Armenia sticking to self-determination and Azerbaijan to territorial integrity. Another resolution on Belarus was also not adopted owing to the disagreement of Azerbaijan, Moldova and Ukraine. Source: <http://www.easternpartnership.org/community/events/first-turbulent-session-Euronest>

It is much too early to assess Euronest's potential impact. However, several major issues emerged after the inaugural session:

- Eastern partners' representation: Taking into account the discrepancies between the EU and Eastern partners' political regimes, a major issue for Euronest is to ensure that, beyond the case of Belarus, opposition forces are represented in the delegations appointed by neighbouring countries; this is the case for Ukraine and Moldova, less so for South Caucasus (with the exception of Armenia). Moreover, the equal number of seats attributed to Eastern partners is questionable, as far as it does not take into account differences in the countries' size. The assembly's composition, therefore, should be carefully monitored and regularly reviewed.
- EU representation: Western member states (both large - UK, France, Spain, Italy- and of course to a lesser extent smaller ones - Ireland, Portugal, Belgium, Luxembourg) are clearly underrepresented in the EP delegation to Euronest while Central Eastern EU members are overrepresented (with Poland, Lithuania and Romania having the largest delegations). To take a concrete example, the UK and France both have one delegate while Lithuania has eight. While such national imbalances reflect national foreign policy priorities and as such exist in all EP delegations to other regional assemblies, in the Eastern partnership they are even more important as they are replicated in all institutional formats.

- Interaction with other EaP actors/formats/initiatives: Four committees (Political Affairs, Human Rights and Democracy; Economic Affairs, legal approximation and convergence with EU policies; Energy Security; Culture, Education and Civil Society) have been established within Euronest,¹⁵ reflecting the four thematic platforms in which the European Parliament is a permanent participant.. However, so far the EP's involvement in the platforms has remained formal. The assembly's representatives have not adopted a proactive stance in all platform meetings they attended, since they did not take the floor on these occasions.¹⁶ Interaction with the Civil Society Forum has also been limited. Moreover, Euronest's participation in other EaP activities is circumscribed to the technical level. At the EaP's current stage of development, both the political input of Euronest and its role in shaping and monitoring the policy process are therefore limited.
- Joint ownership: Euronest is co-chaired by a EaP representative (Boris Tarasyuk, Ukrainian former Minister of Foreign Affairs).¹⁷ Out of its 8 vice-presidents, four are members of the European Parliament and four come from partner countries.. However, while the EU/partner countries' equilibrium in the assembly's bureau is respected, it seems that the EU imposed its vision on Eastern partners during the first session.¹⁸ This is also linked to the fact that neighbouring countries do not have a similar level of interest in Euronest, in connection either to their general stance on the EaP multilateral track or to their specific position on the parliamentary assembly.

Overall, the European Parliament certainly intends to play a prominent role in the ENP and in the EaP, as reflected both in the resolution adopted in April 2011 and in the draft recommendations it intended to deliver to the EaP summit. Its role in the foreign policy process is however still limited, and this is especially the case under a complex initiative like the EaP in which the EEAS and member states are pivotal.

There are nevertheless specific expectations vis-à-vis the European Parliament, especially when it comes to defending the EU's political values and to supporting the role of civil society organisations in the Eastern neighbourhood. The EP should therefore seek to develop synergies with the Civil Society Forum and other participatory initiatives to push its own priorities forward in the policy process. However, this will be a difficult task in light of the disagreements and divergences between partner countries which have already hampered the effectiveness of Euronest, as it was obvious during the first ordinary session in Strasbourg. Overall, Euronest's very political nature and to a lesser extent the limited role played by the EP in the EU foreign policy process are important obstacles to the assembly's influence in the multilateral track.

Conference of Regional and Local Authorities of the Eastern Partnership (CORLEAP)

In its 2008 communication on the Eastern Partnership, the Commission invited the Committee of the Regions to establish an Eastern Europe and South Caucasus Local and Regional Assembly. However, like its Euronest counterpart the setting-up of this assembly has been delayed, although for different reasons. Administrative factors (mainly insufficient human resources dedicated to this task within the Committee of Regions) account for the late gathering of the CORLEAP assembly. This was combined with the fact that external relations are not the Committee's core business. Over the past three years, when it comes to external action the CoR has mainly been involved with the organisation of CORLEAP's counterpart for the Mediterranean partners, ARLEM (Regional and Local Euro-Mediterranean Assembly).¹⁹ As a result, the inauguration of the Conference of Regional and Local Authorities of the Eastern Partnership (CORLEAP) took place in Poznań in September 2011. The statement adopted at the Conference calls for a greater involvement of local and regional authorities in the Eastern Partnership, including through increased funding for projects strengthening local democracy and through specific sections in the agreements currently being negotiated with partner countries.²⁰ In the future, CORLEAP is expected to meet on an annual basis.

When it comes to representation of partner countries, CORLEAP has not been confronted to the problems described above for Euronest. Eastern partners' members of the Conference have been appointed following a bottom-up process. The prerequisite for being appointed was to be a locally elected politician, in order to establish a peer-to-peer assembly. In each partner country the Committee of Regions contacted associations of local/regional authorities and merely informed central authorities of the appointment process. As far as the EU membership of CORLEAP is concerned, national imbalances are similar to those existing in other EaP formats, since the bulk of EU members comes from Central Eastern member states (mainly Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary). On top of the 36 members, three permanent observers are part of CORLEAP: Euronest, the Civil Society Forum and the Council of Europe's Congress of Local Authorities.

Overall, given the delay in setting the assembly, it is still too early to say whether the 'long-awaited CORLEAP will become a thriving centre of cooperation between regional and local authorities from the EU and Eastern Partnership countries', as hoped by Commissioner Stefan Füle.²¹ The inaugural session this year is expected to serve as a first step towards establishing a regular forum for cooperation; the main objective, however, was also to issue recommendations to the EaP Head of States 2011 summit in Poland, which the President of the CoR will attend.

Besides CORLEAP, it should be pointed out that the Committee of Regions is involved in other EaP formats and activities. It issues opinions on EaP bilateral developments (one per partner country in 2010). As far as the multilateral track is concerned, it is a permanent member of thematic platforms 1 and 4 and intends to apply for platforms 2 and 3. It pays specific attention to platform 1, especially to issues pertaining to local administration.

To sum up, subject to sufficient administrative capacities the Committee of Regions is likely to get more involved in targeted EaP activities matching its areas of expertise in the future. Given that local and regional development and self-government are also important issues in partner countries, CORLEAP is unlikely to face the same problems as Euronest, even though the EU and its neighbours may have different approaches towards local democracy. In other words, common interests may be developed around concrete projects favouring regional and local development.

Eastern Partnership Business Forum

Another example of participatory initiative is the first Eastern Partnership Business Forum, which will be held in Sopot on 30 September 2011, as an event accompanying the official Eastern Partnership Summit. The Forum's objective is to provide a platform for experience sharing, establishing business contacts and discussing investment opportunities and joint projects implemented by entrepreneurs and governments. The Forum is thus another example of participatory initiative likely to increase interconnections between EU and partner countries societies.

Conclusions and recommendations: turning the eastern partnership's multilateral track into an effective socialisation framework

While the Eastern Partnership's institutional set-up is still under construction, some preliminary lessons can be drawn from its early functioning, which highlights tensions in the policy:

- The EaP's multilateral track should seek to increasingly involve EU Western Member States in order to turn the EaP into a EU-wide foreign policy. For obvious reasons, the EU's Eastern dimension was developed by Central and Eastern EU member states, i.e. by countries geographically, historically and culturally close to Eastern neighbours and whose reform experience was highly relevant to Ukraine, Moldova, Belarus and the South Caucasus. Owing to its foreign policy emphasis on political values, peace and stability, Sweden also played a role in this process. The strong engagement displayed by Central and Eastern European countries and a few others (e.g. Germany, Sweden), at all levels, in the institutional framework has been instrumental in boosting the EaP. At the same time, the Eastern Partnership is an ambitious policy which raises major questions about the whole EU's future and thus requires the participation from a wide range of member states. Therefore, it is now time to seek a greater involvement from those Western EU member states who, owing to the lack of traditional links with the Eastern neighbourhood initially displayed little interest for the EaP. Their participation, if existent, has so far been limited in many EaP events and formats. Nonetheless, their attitude may indeed change together with the policy's developing. For instance, the fact that two Western European member states, France and the Netherlands, recently appointed special representatives for the Eastern Partnership²² is obviously an indicator of a new interest for the policy.

- The EaP's multilateral formats gather neighbouring countries with various aspirations and thus a different level of involvement. Now that with the Eastern Partnership the EU proposes a similar offer to all neighbours subject to their reform efforts, the discrepancy between 'frontrunners' and 'laggards' (Shapovalova 2009) has become less visible. Nevertheless, those countries considered as the most advanced in their relationship with the EU (i.e. Moldova, Ukraine, and to a lesser extent Georgia) favour bilateral links at the expenses of multilateral meetings which are perceived as one-size-fits-all exercises. In other words, important objectives assigned to the EaP's multilateral track (e.g. facilitate the development of common positions and joint activities, foster links among the partners themselves) stumble against the gaps in partner countries's situations and membership aspirations. The consensus needed under the highest political meetings and the platforms makes decisions very difficult to reach, given also existing tensions between some Eastern neighbours. This is not likely to improve in the near future, as the whole Eastern partnership (and not only its institutional set-up) is a moving target; differences will thus broaden with the conclusion of the first AAs/DCFTAs. To put things more bluntly, the 'Eastern neighbourhood' (and thus, the EaP's multilateral track) is a EU construction which gathers non-contiguous and very diverse countries; it is sustainable only because the ENP's finalité is not clearly defined. At the same time, there is no better policy alternative for the time being. To engage the most advanced countries, the multilateral track should therefore be combined with stronger additional incentives under the bilateral track for those countries aspiring to get closer to the EU.

²² The Czech Republic and Poland also have special representatives for the Eastern Partnership.

- The main source of tension in the EaP's multi-lateral track originates in the combination of a logic based upon joint ownership, inclusiveness and socialisation with some elements reflecting a more hierarchical approach and limiting participation. On the one hand, the multilateral track is open to the involvement of a wide range of stakeholders (including civil society) to develop the dialogue between the EU and its neighbours at all levels of governance; on the other hand, synergies between these levels are weak and the participation of civil society in the governmental track is de facto restricted. In a similar vein, as far as the governmental track is concerned the application of the joint ownership principle has been patchy so far, with the EU side taking the lead (also for organisation and coordination purposes). The multilateral track should stick to its initial (and innovant) socialisation approach, i.e. act as an inclusive forum of discussion where all stakeholders should have a say on an equal footing. In other words:
 - as a major actor in the EaP's functioning (see European Commission 2011) and an important driver for its visibility, civil society should systematically be invited in panels', and possibly also in platforms meetings ;
 - targeted and concrete meetings, e.g. in the panels' formats, should be encouraged with a view to reaching tangible and visible results and to developing bottom-up processes;
 - more synergies should be sought between various formats and initiatives

To sum up, the results of the discussions, exchanges of experience and networking undertaken under the EaP multilateral track are so far modest. However, foundations have been laid for a greater interconnection between the EU and its Eastern partners at all levels, in other words for a horizontal or network governance. The socialisation approach requires time in order to yield tangible results and this should be kept in mind when analysing the multilateral dimension of the Eastern partnership.
